

New York City's Ice Cream Scene Is Just Getting Better and Better

Three of the city's most popular spots are opening new locations this year.

ELISABETH SHERMAN April 12, 2018

Nothing spells sunshine like a whole slew of new ice cream shops arriving in New York City for the summer. Just as the weather is slowly but surely creeping into the sixties, three ice cream companies have announced new locations in the city. You know what they say: Three's a trend, and this is one we can really get behind.

The first is Van Leeuwen, which offers flavors such as honeycomb and candied ginger. The company is currently constructing three new locations in Nolita, Prospect Heights, and Greenpoint, according to one report. The Greenpoint location is expected to open this summer. Yet another outpost of Van Leeuwen on the Upper West Side is slated to open this spring.

QUINN